Dear Family,

Life is busy with many things and those activities are not the same for any two people. A young person may be anxious about school and grades, while an unmarried person may be concerned about making a living and paying for housing, and other responsibilities. Married couples concern themselves about caring for each other and the family they are responsible for. So many things in this world can pull us from our walk of faith. In today's reading, St. Paul invites us to be free from anxiety so that we may live in harmony with God, free from distraction. It does not matter whether we are anxious about the things of the world or the things of the Lord--it is the anxiety itself that pulls us from God. God invites us into a life of freedom. Freedom from fear, worry, and anxiety allows us to be more fully present to one another, to the God who loves us, and to be a witness to all the blessings God has showered upon us.

As we sit in prayer this week, let us reflect on the distractions that do pull us away from God, let us lift these distractions up to God and ask for His strength to combat these events and to lead us closer to His side.

Deacon Joe
